So strong and so general was this erroneous impression, originating in pure ignorance of the laws of Political Economy, that when railways were coming into operation and horses by thousands were required more than before, we had to go abroad for a supply, because horse-breeding had been largely given up. But it was soon found that for every coach with its teams, etc., wanted in the olden time, scores were demanded for the traffic which sprang up between the numerous Stations erected along the different lines, and the adjoining towns and country. More coaches, more drivers, more horses, more cattle-dealers, more stable-keepers, etc., were called for, and, therefore, more graziers, more customers to the farmer for oats and hay, more farriers, more coach-builders--besides the host of porters, clerks, labourers, engineers, navvies, coal and iron miners...
