Not surprisingly, echoes of these momentous events can often be found in Romantic Writing, such as in Blake's 'A Song of Liberty', which interrogates the French Revolution. For England, however, it was probably the Industrial Revolution with its countless social and labour-related repercussions that played the most pivotal role. Urban manufacturing centres transformed the primarily agricultural society into a modern industrial nation. The mechanization of the working processes, numerous enclosure acts, and resultant unemployment of agricultural labourers, led to a population drift to cities as well as rural pauperization. The end result: three million labouring poor with low incomes from 6 to 15 pounds a year made up the largest section of the British population. 16 pp. Englisch.
