Although the doubtful elements which have been mentioned come into the estimates as to the character of lines, the large number of plates from which the material was taken gave an opportunity to study each line under various conditions of intensity and degree of separation, so that the classification as to character is probably as accurate as can be made without very much greater field-strength combined with as high resolving power as was here used. n and p are used throughout this paper as abbreviations of normal and parallel. n denotes the Zeeman components given by light vibrations in a plane at right angles to the lines of magnetic force, and p those given by vibrations parallel to the forcelines. The symbols correspond to the letters s and p regularly used in German publications. 4. Weight. Under this heading, each line for which measurement...
